The Clash of Ignorance

Edward W. Said

from The Nation (2001)

The Clash of Ignorance

Samuel Huntington's article, "The Clash of Civilizations and the Remaking of the World Order," appeared in the Summer 1993 issue of Foreign Affairs. In this article, Huntington argues that the world is divided into distinct civilizations, each with its own culture, values, and institutions. The clash of civilizations is a major source of conflict in the world, and it is the main driver of political change.

Huntington's article has been widely discussed and debated. Some have praised it for its insights, while others have criticized it for its narrow perspective. Some have noted that Huntington's model is too simplistic, while others have argued that it is too complex.

In this essay, I will argue that Huntington's model is too simplistic. I will show that the world is not divided into distinct civilizations, but rather that it is a complex and interconnected system of states and societies.

The world is not divided into distinct civilizations, but rather that it is a complex and interconnected system of states and societies.
THE CLASH OF IGNORANCE

In this document, the author argues that the clash of ignorance is a driving force behind the conflict between the East and the West. The author states that the modern world is characterized by a clash of ignorance, where the East and the West are driven by ignorance and misinformation, leading to misunderstandings and conflicts. The author emphasizes the importance of understanding and bridging the gap between the two worlds to achieve peace and understanding. The text also highlights the role of education and knowledge in resolving conflicts and promoting peace. The document concludes with a call to action for individuals and societies to overcome ignorance and work towards a more harmonious world.